After graduating from the University of California, Berkeley in 1924, he studied photography at the California School of Fine Arts in San Francisco. Howe began his career at the Santa Barbara News-Press. He moved to Los Angeles in 1925, working as a photographer and he became a professional photographer in 1927. His California photographs include work for Life, Look, Vanity Fair, National Geographic, and The Saturday Evening Post. In 1933, he began producing the highly influential (for Hollywood) Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Technicolor productions of Wizard of Oz, Alice in Wonderland, and South Pacific. Before World War II, his work was shown in New York at the Museum of Modern Art; the Metropolitan Museum of Art; and the Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts. At the 1951 Cannes Film Festival, he won the first Grand Prize in the "New Directors" competition. In the 1940s and 1950s, Howe's steady commitment to mainstream popular film production (for which he is still probably best known) was remarkable for its consistency. It was not the prestigious art house film for which other mainstream directors were responsible. With the exception of Fritz Lang's film of Shakespeare's Macbeth (1948), Howe was not a critically acclaimed independent or avant-garde "lone ranger" artist. Although he could generate a considerable public reputation, Howe never established himself as a critical or financial superstar. Between 1941 and 1955, he directed twenty-eight films; his last was the notable Cry
