As the use of Internet Protocol (IP) networks to transmit information continues to increase, a growing demand has developed for converged communications services that offer a single point of access to voice, video, and data. Such converged communications services typically combine voice, video, and data into a single packetized stream that is transmitted over a data network such as the Internet, which has a broader bandwidth capacity than the traditional Public Switched Telephone Network (PSTN). One disadvantage of carrying voice, video, and data as separate communications services is that traditional circuit-switched telephony networks are incapable of dealing with sophisticated services such as Interactive Voice Response (IVR) or Voice Mail Handling (VMH) that require higher signal quality. For these services to work properly, the signal carrying each communications service must maintain a connection at a minimum quality level. One approach to providing converged communications services is to perform real-time transport protocols (RTP), such as Real-time Transport Protocol (RTP) described in RFC (Request for Comments) 1889 of the Internet Engineering Task Force (IETF). RTP provides for transport of real-time data, such as voice or video, using Internet Protocol (IP), which is used to carry many different types of data. RTP defines the payload format and the way packets are sent. It also indicates the timing of packets and provides for the monitoring and maintaining of timing information. In an IP network, packets are routed based on a destination address included in the packet header. If a packet is addressed to a specific terminal (e.g., an email or voice mail client), the packet is delivered to the terminal. If a packet is addressed to a group of terminals, the packet is routed to the next network switch along the route. In this type of network architecture, a packet addressed to a specific destination address is delivered to the address when it arrives at the switch. If the packet addressed to a group of terminals is received by a switch, the switch forwards the packet to all the terminals listed in the packet header. A real-time packet is delivered to the destination terminal or terminals as it arrives at the switch. Real-time packets are not sent to all the addresses listed in the packet header until all of the packets are delivered to the destination. For example, real-time video is transmitted to a group of terminals as they are logged on to the network, one at a time. Each packet is addressed to a particular terminal and thus the packet is sent to that particular
